

CURRENT HISTORY

October 2008

Vol. 107, No. 711

CONTENTS

- 307 War in Georgia, Jitters All Around Svante E. Cornell
With the invasion of a small Caucasian neighbor, Moscow declared itself boss once again of its backyard. But how fearsome a boss—and how big is the yard?
- 315 It Is Still Putin's Russia Kathryn Stoner-Weiss
Observers search for policy distinctions between Dmitri Medvedev and Vladimir Putin. It seems ever more clear that the president serves at the prime minister's pleasure.
- 322 Moscow's New Economic Imperialism Marshall I. Goldman
Russia's energy deposits and its ruthlessness in leveraging them around the world make the country a formidable actor again. But the petrostate's power has limits.
- 330 Seeds of Discontent: Russia's Food Woes Jessica Allina-Pisano
A nation as rich and strong as Russia should be able to provide its people with affordably priced food. It cannot, and a legacy of bad policies is the reason.
- 336 The Health Crisis in Russia's Ranks Murray Feshbach
The population shrinks at a stunning rate. The health of the citizenry, even the young, scarcely befits a former superpower. No wonder staffing the military is getting hard.
- PERSPECTIVES
- 342 How the West Failed Georgia Alexander Cooley
For years, Americans and Europeans failed to forge a unified policy on Georgia. Then came recognition of Kosovo. It is not surprising that Russia pounced.
- 344 The Fate of Georgian Democracy Julie A. George and Christoph H. Stefes
As Russian tanks rolled south, the political viability of Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili looked tenuous at best. He (and his country) might yet endure, and thrive.
- BOOKS
- 348 Yeltsin's Uncertain Legacy William W. Finan Jr.
A new book argues that the former Russian president deserves a place among the world's great democrats. If only he had not been so reckless with executive authority and the economy.
- THE MONTH IN REVIEW
- 350 August 2008
An international chronology of events in August, country by country, day by day.