

CURRENT HISTORY

October 2009

Vol. 108, No. 720

CONTENTS

- 299 NATO and Russia: Partnership or Peril? Dmitri Trenin
The Atlantic alliance and Russia need to decide, and soon, whether they want to build security with or against each other. Partnership would be far better for both sides.
- 304 After START: Hurdles Ahead Steven Pifer
Moscow and Washington face tricky issues in negotiating a post-START nuclear arms reduction pact that both sides want. After it is signed, the really hard work will begin.
- 311 Will Moscow Help with Trouble Spots? Yury E. Fedorov
The United States hopes for Russia's assistance with Iran, Afghanistan, North Korea, and the Middle East. Hoping is not the same as getting.
- 318 Why Russia Is So Russian Andrew C. Kuchins
Since Vladimir Putin came to power, Russia has reverted to traditional themes that characterized both czarist and Soviet approaches to foreign policy.
- 325 Behind the Central Asian Curtain:
the Limits of Russia's Resurgence Alexander Cooley
The Georgia war notwithstanding, events of the past year suggest that Moscow's efforts to maintain hegemony in its "backyard" are becoming increasingly difficult and costly.
- 333 No Obituaries Yet for Capitalism in Russia Samuel Charap
Some observers predicted the Kremlin would use Russia's economic crisis as cover to seize control over more of the economy. So far, that has not happened. Second in a series on changing relations between governments and markets.

PERSPECTIVE

- 339 Rule of Law, Russian-Style Kathryn Hendley
Russia's courts have become more reliable in cases that do not involve influential persons. But amid official corruption and public passivity, the rule of law cannot take hold.

BOOKS

- 341 Seeing Russia Clearly William W. Finan Jr.
Stephen F. Cohen in a new book argues that the Soviet Union was not necessarily doomed to fail, but the US response to the Soviet collapse was.

THE MONTH IN REVIEW

- 343 August 2009
An international chronology of events in August, country by country, day by day.