CONTENTS

- 291 The Liberal World Order Loses Its Leader Mlada Bukovansky
In the aftermath of World War II, the United States built and led international institutions that tried to find a balance between order and justice. Now it is casting off that responsibility.
- 297 Why the American Center Held—and Then Fell Apart Jennifer Delton
The early Cold War era was defined by broad bipartisan support for a strong, activist government. The 1960s brought political and cultural realignments that would end the liberal consensus.
- 303 The Liberal International Economic Order on the Brink. Kristen Hopewell
Trump’s “America First” rhetoric is a break from the past, but the zero-sum trade policies he calls for are not so different from the way Washington has long dealt with weaker trading partners.
- 309 Trump and the Retreat from Human Rights. Omar G. Encarnación
With a US president indifferent at best to its concerns, can the global human rights movement, already diminished by double standards, find a clearer purpose and a more solid legal basis?
- 315 Can Democracies Learn from China’s Meritocratic System? Daniel A. Bell
Voters in Western democracies have made some questionable choices lately. Chinese-style meritocracy, despite its flaws, may produce better-qualified leaders and a more pragmatic policy-making process.

PERSPECTIVE

- 320 Has Inequality Led to a Crisis for Liberalism? Jeffrey Edward Green
The growing wealth gap has eroded support for liberal democracy by exposing its unfulfilled egalitarian promises. A renewal of civic obligations could be the best defense against creeping plutocracy.

BOOKS

- 324 The Impoverished Rhetoric of the US Welfare State Kimberly J. Morgan
A new book lays blame for the weak social safety net on political rhetoric that justifies government aid as an individual right and not a public good—a tradition that dates back to the New Deal.
