CONTENTS

- 291 Economic Wishful Thinking and the Democratic Crisis Jacqueline Best
Leaders of liberal democracies heavily invested in theories that economic decision-making could be walled off from the impure world of politics. The global financial crisis proved them wrong.
- 298 The Great Recession and the Destruction of Minority Wealth. Douglas S. Massey and Jacob S. Rugh
Racist housing policies prevented African Americans from building wealth in the twentieth century. Then came predatory lending. Third in a series on social mobility around the world.
- 304 The Great Recession's Lasting Impact on Labor. Chris Tilly
Political choices led to extended unemployment and a shift in power from workers to employers. The experience of the 1930s shows that restoring the balance is both possible and wise.
- 310 The Cost of Austerity Policies for Public Health Aaron Reeves
Cutbacks in social spending imposed during the recession may have been responsible for curbing life expectancy gains in Europe and the United States. The effects are still being felt.
- 315 Post-Crisis Political Change in Western Europe. Julia Lynch and Jonathan Hopkin
The recent rise of populism is a culmination of long-term trends. As the established parties converged on economic orthodoxies, they lost their hold on a changing electorate.

- 321 The Upside of a Messier Global Financial Architecture. Ilene Grabel
At least one good thing may have emerged from the crisis: new international lending institutions led by developing nations are challenging and complementing the old US-dominated regime.

- 325 A Secret History of the Crash?. Harold James
A new account of the 2008 crisis and the turbulent decade that followed shows how global capitalism's self-inflicted wounds accelerated major geopolitical realignments.
