

"Correspondents in all their glory went and came, seeing nothing. Here is the man who was there, who saw all that one man had time to see of the greatest moments of the present time, who was able to tell what he saw. A young attaché of the American Embassy at Paris, Eric Fisher Wood, was singled out as it seems, by Fate, in the same manner in which a Government sometimes picks a single newspaper witness to view and report its deeds of arms; and Fate chose carefully. Her chosen reporter had the unjaded eye which no professional of the pen can long preserve. He had the calm and courage to keep his eye at work on startling occasions when most men's senses would shy or bolt. He was cool enough to observe, yet impressionable enough to appreciate. And so he has written a book not likely to be duplicated."—The Evening Sun, New York.

"If Mr. Wood had been wandering about with an invisible cap and the wings of Mercury during those seven months in the war zone, he could not have traveled much more widely or seen many more phases of the war than he did as the attaché of our Ambassador to France.

"Mr. Wood kept a diary from day to day, and in 'The Notebook of an Attaché' we get one of the most intimate, personal, diversified, enlightening descriptions of Europe, and especially of France, at war, that has been published. It is a straight-away, descriptive, unbiased account of what an alert young man who knows how to write saw and heard and thought; and a great deal of what he tells has never found its way to the press.

"An appendix furnishes about all the condensable information on the equipment, casualties, hospitals, aeroplanes and other military features of all the armies which Mr. Wood was able personally to discover or to learn of from authoritative sources."—Los Angeles Times.
